PEACE WORK IN TRANSFORMATION

40TH ANNIVERSARY CEREMONY AND CONFERENCE

Anniversary Ceremony and Conference

At the ASPR we can look back on 40 years of peace and conflict resolution work. Participants from around the world have come to Stadtschlaining, and joined numerous international dialogue processes, training exercises, and peacebuilding courses, and research conferences. The research developed here has contributed to improving the peacebuilding community's understanding of the challenges faced.

Transformation has always been a part of our work during our 40 years of engagement. We want it to stay that way for another 40 years, so our anniversary is also an occasion to look forward. The anniversary celebrations and the conference will be dedicated to the topics and challenges of today and tomorrow. With a view to the intersection between the climate crisis and digital technologies with peace and conflict, key figures and experts will discuss their experiences and innovations in the context of the peace work of the future, topics which will be explored in greater depth during the conference workshops.

Long-standing partners of our institute from civil society and academia, from national and international governmental institutions, as well as from international and regional organizations are invited to participate in the celebrations and the conference.

*The content of this tentative agenda may be subjected to change.
The events for our anniversary will take place under the current Corona protection regulations.*

Friedensarbeit in Transformation

Das ASPR blickt auf 40 Jahre Friedens- und Konfliktarbeit zurück.

Seit unserer Gründung sind wir durch unsere Forschung und durch zahlreiche internationale Dialogprozesse sowie Trainings als Friedensakteur tätig. Wir sehen Transformation als einen wichtigen Teil unserer Arbeit und wollen daher das diesjährige 40-jährige Jubiläum zum Anlass nehmen, einen Blick auf die Themen und Herausforderungen von heute und morgen zu werfen.

Peace Work in Transformation

At ASPR, we look back on 40 years of peace and conflict work.

Since our foundation, we have been working as a peace actor through our research and through numerous international dialogue processes as well as trainings. We see transformation as an important part of our work and therefore want to use this year's 40th anniversary as an opportunity to take a look at the issues and challenges of today and tomorrow.

The Future of Peace and Conflict

10.00 OPENING DEBATE

Rethinking Security – Rethinking Peace

Current developments call into question our understanding of peaceful coexistence and cooperative security on the European continent. Many boundaries have been crossed, and many irreversible steps have been taken. In light of this, a return to the status quo ante seems unimaginable. In any case, it seems clear that if security in Europe and beyond its borders has to be rethought, peace has to be rethought as well. Once the dynamics of escalation will have stopped, any way forward will require a long process of dialogue and confidence building on many levels. Such a different perspective on the political shifts and developments we see in the context of Ukraine opens a pathway to avoid zero-sum solutions that could easily become dominant.

11.45 PANEL DEBATE

Game-changer conflicts - What next?
Lessons for Peacebuilding in Ukraine from Kosovo, Iraq and Libya

Every conflict situation is unique. The recent escalation of the conflict in Ukraine changed the European perception of security and will have effects we still cannot fully foresee. A road back to security, stability and peace is difficult to perceive in Europe. And yet, other regions in the world went through similar game-changing experiences. Against this background, this session will look at lessons that can be drawn from such contexts, in a positive and in a negative sense. Of particular interest will, thus, be the war and conflict in Kosovo, Iraq and Libya since 1999, 2003 and 2011 respectively since they have changed regional and international dynamics in many ways. They have a profound and lasting impact on their respective populations until today. What can be learned for peacebuilding in Ukraine?

14.15 PANEL DISCUSSION

Environment, Climate Crisis, and Conflict:
A geopolitical perspective

The climate and ecological crises are accelerating. They will bring with them fundamental changes to geographies, resource distribution and usher humanity into a new phase of fundamental geo-economic transformations. At the moment, these trends are accelerating competition at geopolitical levels rather than competition, causing the multi-lateral system to fragment and suffer a crisis of legitimacy. The war in Ukraine is the latest indication that the international order is shifting into complex territory with international and planetary consequences. The weaponization of economic and energy inter-dependencies is a new trend that threatens the fragmentation of the international community into different spheres, all the while impacting vulnerable countries in a way that dampen stabilization or development prospects. All of this is happening at a time when climate- and technology-related transitions lead to profound changes in societies and in notion of security itself, and lead to more competition for geo-economic dominance. This session will explore the complex links relating geopolitics with planetary boundaries and question what needs to change about the ways in which we conceptualise of and work towards peace. Furthermore it will ask what peace and stability in a climate-disrupted world are? What should it aim to do and can new visions for peace mandates be imagined, even when geopolitical competition flares up?

16.00 PANEL DISCUSSION

Environment, Climate Crisis, and Conflict:
A peacebuilding perspective

Peacebuilders and international mediators often considered themselves marginal to the fight against climate change. In fact, they felt often more powerless than anything, being cornered into handling the consequences of extreme ecological degradation and climate disruptions and the human insecurity they bring with them. But in the overarching climate security narrative of the past decade, peacemakers could not address drivers of climate disruptions. Science has now equipped us with the understanding that ecosystems approaches, environmental protection and regeneration need to feature chiefly at the top of peacemaking priorities – not just for the benefit of climate adaptation and mitigation, but very much for the benefit of local populations and stabilisation at various levels. In fact, it is the latter that needs to take priority. The question remains how to integrate nature at the negotiation table, and how to use the power of regeneration techniques to create better dialogue, reconciliation and stabilization. Peacebuilding efforts now need to understand conflict not just from the perspective of human dynamics, but from the perspective of eco-systemic integrity and that of the relationships between human societies and their natural environment.

9.15 OPENING DEBATE

Technology and Digitalisation in Peace and Conflict: Two Sides of One Coin?

The development of new technology often brings with it a certain idealism and the promise for a better future, but technology can also be used for harm. In practice this means that new and emerging technologies increasingly play a central role in contemporary and atypical forms of conflict, both, as drivers of conflicts and as tools for conflict work. Assessing contemporary security threats and risks as well as exploring the potential of technologies for conflict prevention and peacebuilding will therefore be the focus of this debate. Hence, presenters will address topics such as the potentials and pitfalls at the interface between technology-peace-conflict as well as its political impacts, not least with regard to Ukraine.

Speakers to be announced.
